Grocer son's HIV project in final 3 for Harvard award

Mumbai: Sultan Khetani, a youth from a small village in Gujarat's Anand district, is now part of a team of researchers whose project on HIV has made it to the finals of a prestigious award at Harvard.

The son of a grocer in Dharangani village, Khetani left home when he was barely four years old and lived in hostels in Panchgani and Mumbai, set up by the Fidal Trust and the Life Trust, both of which work towards the betterment of the Khoja Ismaili community. The trusts took care of his education. "I have been very lucky. I have always been surrounded-diagnosis. Simply put, this would mean creating a device that would help people detect whether their bodies contained the virus, much the way a glucometer helps diabetes patients measure their glucose levels.

Khetani is part of a team of eight researchers working on the project, which has made it to the finals of Harvard Medical School's BWH Bright Future Prize. The project is one of three finalists.

The winning team gets a cash prize of $100,000 for research. While the finalists were chosen through a team of experts, the winner will be selected through an online voting

Way Forward: India as a country has a great opportunity on the world map because it has a young population. Youth is the strength of the country and the society. However it is a double edged sword. If not taken care it may work against the country. Education facilitates thinking in the correct direction. After spending the stipulated 5 years with us, the youth will soon be out of the poverty circle and will enjoy a better quality of life. This will also help the society and the country making it a better place to live.

We seek support in the following areas for creating pathways for our beneficiaries :

- Monetary Support
- Study Beyond Graduation / Abroad Studies Support
- Network
- Intelligence
- Guidance

This would ensure our students are global citizens.
